Overlooking a breathtaking waterfall, Uraima's thatched-roof cabins accommodate anglers in a rustic kind of luxury you'd hardly expect from a remote jungle location. Each churuata has its own private bathroom. After settling into your cabin, you'll can rig up your fishing gear and head right out with your guide in search of your first payara. Lunch, dinner and overnight at camp.

Day Three though Day Five

FISHING AT URAIMA FALLS

A full day of fishing begins with a hearty breakfast. Set off with your guide to fish the world capital of payara fishing. The payara can best be described as a salmon with an extremely bad attitude. Of course, the four-inch fangs show that it's not your friendly neighborhood salmon. Fishing takes place within five minutes of launching your 30-foot dugout canoe into the river from your environment. The lodge claims the IGFA's all-tackle payara record, currently 39 pounds, as well as most line-class marks. You can also fish for aymara, another powerful species inhabiting the Paragua River. The local guide understands the ways of this crafty fish, as well as the currents of the river and falls.

The fishing season for payara at Uraima Lodge coincides with that of the dry season. The season normally runs from December through mid-May, depending on local conditions. River levels in this watershed can change quickly and affect fishing conditions, regardless of the season or historical patterns. Navigation of boats may also be affected. While we make every attempt to monitor such conditions, anglers assume the risk of these natural forces beyond our control. At mid-day, you can break for lunch, siesta or maybe a refreshing swim before the afternoon fishing session. There is a delightful dining area situated under a large churuata, with an adjoining open bar. Dinner and overnight at camp.
